Poachers slaughter pregnant rhino and calf

Mini helicopter probably used to get to the target animals

A TEN-YEAR-old rhino that was killed with his calf by poachers at a Game Nature Reserve was pregnant and due to give birth in three months.

The 65-year-old man known as Eric Qwintan born in the Eastern Cape, was told by a hunter to her dead ten-year-old calf with her horn sliced off.

The calf's horn, however, was unharmed, something which puzzles the owners of the Rhino and Lion Nature Reserve in Kromdraai, who found the two dead rhinos on Saturday morning.

The calf had a fairly big horn, which was worth about R20,000, but they did not take it. The calf had been with the big female for two years, and I think it was killed when it started interfering with the poachers at work," said reserve leader Mr. Hart.

He estimated his loss, including the two-year claim to be about R40,000.

After the police had taken the crime scene, the two carcasses were taken away and buried as they could not be fed to the lions, because of the growing disease the poachers had started their work to kill them.

They said he believed the poachers used a helicopter to get to the rhinos over the morning.

These rhinos are organised and well equipped. They have

The horn she died for will be worth a fortune to someone for its supposed aphrodisiac properties by the time it reaches China, where the demand is centred.

but other game reserves around us have been hit before, and in almost the same way.

"There is too much money involved in rhino poaching. A horn is worth about 4 million (R40,000) by the time it reaches China, where the market is. We try hard and share the rhino owners, but it doesn't help much."

Hart is taking care of two 16-month-old orphaned calves that lost their parents to poaching in the Kruger National Park.

"I don't know what, but something needs to be done before we lose our entire rhino population to poaching," he said.

After the killings at the weekend, Hart said they would start keeping their rhinos in a house overnight with security on site, and only release them into the wild during the day.

According to a SANParks statement, 25 suspected poachers have been arrested this year, 17 of them in the Kruger National Park, five in Capetown and three in Mpumalanga.

Police said they were still investigating the recent murders at the Kruger and Lion Nature Reserve. No arrests had been made.
